(1) Born in the area now part of Kakegawa-shi, Shizuoka in 1871, Yoshioka Yayoi, née Washiyama, was a remarkable woman who with great efforts successfully obtained a doctor's license in 1892. After modern Japan introduced national medical qualification system in 1874, there were 26 female licensees before her; the first of them passed the exams in 1885. Though at Yoshioka's time women were not excluded in the qualifying examination for medical practice, it was very hard for women to enter medical schools. Not only did she manage to educate and qualify herself, but she attempted to encourage other women to learn for their career opportunities. Eventually she founded in 1900 the Tokyo Women's Medical School, afterwards Tokyo Women's Medical University. Furthermore, she was a working married woman and also a mother.

(2) According to the paragraph above, Yoshioka Yayoi was from (A), moving to Tokyo. She worked as (B).

(C)

1. Yoshioka was the first woman who passed the qualifying examination.
2. Washiyama Yayoi was born in the Edo period.
3. Women could not sit for the national examinations for medical qualification in the Meiji period.
4. Yoshioka Yayoi had a child/children.
5. Yoshioka was the first student at Tokyo Women's Medical School.
6. Yoshioka was the founder of a company for employment services.
