(1) Chilli, turmeric and other spices are often claimed to have health benefits or even the ability to "boost our immune system". But can spices really add any health benefits to our food, or help us avoid illness?

Spices have been a part of our diets for thousands of years - it's second nature to sprinkle our chips with pepper, drink ginger tea and add chillies to our meals. But recently, some spices have been unofficially promoted from everyday food items to all-healing superfoods.

Hillary Clinton reportedly ate one chilli pepper a day while on the campaign trail in 2016 as an attempt to keep off illness. Turmeric, which has been used in Asia for millennia, has found its way into coffee shops around the world in the form of "golden lattes" - and, during the COVID-19 pandemic, into numerous messages that claim it can "boost your immune system" and protect you from getting sick. It's now, according to one celebrity chef, "everywhere".

(Some changes are made for this occasion to a part of the article:

(2) According to the passage above, (A) have been used by humans for a very long time but the recent phenomenon is that some without any solid proof believe that some of the (A) work like cure-all (B).

(3)

1. Hillary Clinton loved the sweet taste of the spices.
2. Turmeric is newly invented in Asia.
3. Some spices have gained popularity over the COVID-19 years.
4. Celebrity chefs are doing good as doctors.
5. Health benefits of the spices are all lies.
6. It is important to take golden latte drinks to protect yourselves.
